

Why this is the last shoulder bag you'll ever need

straitstimes.com

READ MORE >

Squid Game's Park Sung-hoon drops out of drama over sharing of explicit image

TV host Allan Wu sends son off to National Service

How Little Blossom scaled efficiently from Singapore to Asia with Airwallex's all-in-o...

www.airwallex.com

Recommended by Outbrain

Child abuse victims have much higher risk of being abused by their spouses in adulthood: S'pore study

Children whose parents were victims or perpetrators of spousal violence are up to 2.1 times as likely to be abused as well. PHOTO: ST FILE

Theresa Tan

UPDATED JAN 13, 2025, 11:35 AM -

SINGAPORE – A new study on domestic violence has found that those who were abused as a child have a significantly higher risk of being abused by their spouse in adulthood.

The study was conducted by the National Council of Social Service (NCSS) and the findings highlighted the influence of early traumatic experiences and the need for early intervention to break the cycle of abuse, said its director of translational research Eric Hoo.

Understanding how patterns of behaviour tend to be repeated across generations within families is crucial in addressing the root causes of domestic abuse and intervening to prevent such violence, Dr Hoo told The Straits Times.

Why this is the last shoulder bag you'll ever need

straitstimes.com

READ MORE >

The study analysed administrative data, such as government records and social services delivered, of about 200,000 Singapore residents.

Individuals were not identified from the data analysed.

Results from the study, which is part of an ongoing research programme, were presented at the Asian Family Conference in November 2024.

Its key findings are:

Morning Briefing

Get a round-up of the top stories to start your day

By signing up, I accept SPH Media's Terms & Conditions and Privacy Policy as amended from time to time.

Yes, I would also like to receive SPH Media Group's marketing and promotions.

- A person who was abused as a child is 1.8 times as likely to be abused by their spouse in adulthood, compared with someone who did not suffer child abuse.
- Children whose parents were victims or perpetrators of spousal violence are up to 2.1 times as likely to be abused, compared with those whose parents did not suffer spousal violence.
- In families where there is spousal violence, the provision of financial aid and protection services, such as a mandatory counselling programme, can reduce the risk of child abuse. The programme, which is administered by the Ministry of Social and Family Development (MSF), and other protection services give families skills and support to resolve conflicts in a respectful and non-violent manner, Dr Hoo said.

He said one reason those abused as children are more likely to be abused by their spouses in adulthood can be explained by a framework known as attachment theory.

The widely studied theory of human bonding says that children's cognitive, social and emotional development are influenced by their relationships with caregivers such as parents.

Disruptions in these early relationships could lead to vulnerabilities in relationships they form later in life.

For example, abused children may develop insecure attachment styles as their parents become a source of harm or fear, instead of people who provide emotional support and safety.

This can affect the children's understanding of boundaries, trust and how to resolve conflicts.

As a result, they may later find it hard to recognise unhealthy relationship patterns or may even tolerate abuse.

MORE ON THIS TOPIC

Less serious child abuse cases in S'pore on the rise: Report on family violence

Spousal abuse cases rise as more willing to report abusive husband or wife, say social workers

Dr Hoo said these factors increase the likelihood of being in an abusive relationship, perpetuating the cycle of violence across generations.

Care Corner Singapore deputy director of family and community services Martin Chok said that it has come across adults who stay in abusive relationships as they feel they "don't deserve better" or think that nobody except their abusive spouse would love them.

Some also fear losing the relationship if they report their abuser.

Mr Chok noted that children who experience violence at home may learn from and behave in the same way as their abusive parents when they grow up.

He said: "To them, violence could be a normal way of coping with conflict. Or they become desensitised towards violence, and they don't think that violence is wrong."

Ms Jasmine Lee, associate lead social worker at Montfort Care Child Protection, offered some reasons why children whose parents have experienced spousal violence are more likely to be abused as well.

A child could get injured while trying to stop his parents from fighting, or the abusive parent may hit or threaten to hit the child to get the other parent to give in, she said.

Mr Chok added that some parents cannot cope with multiple stresses and take it out on their loved ones, such as spouses and children.

He said the study's findings show the critical need to help children overcome the trauma of abuse to break the cycle of violence.

Dr Hoo said that the study's insights will inform the MSF's and the NCSS' design of their services and programmes.

The study comes in the wake of a growing number of spousal violence and less severe child abuse cases.

In 2023, there were 2,008 new spousal violence cases, up from 1,741 in 2022, said the MSF's Domestic Violence Trends Report released in September 2024.

The ministry attributed the growing number of cases to greater awareness and reporting of family violence, coupled with better detection of such violence.

- Theresa Tan is the senior social affairs correspondent at The Straits Times. She covers issues that affect families, youth and vulnerable groups.

MORE ON THIS TOPIC

She sacrificed her career, yet controlling husband made her feel she was never good enough

Singapore couple shelter 'brother's' wife, 3 kids who left home over spousal violence fears

In Your Opinion In Your Opinion

▶ s from Fukushima, but will SG ever accept nuclear
00:00 / 35:24

In Your Opinion Follow podcast

Synopsis: Every second Wednesday of the month, The Straits Times takes a hard look at Singapore's social issues of the ...

- ▶ No deaths from Fukushima, but will SG ever accept nuclear energy? 35:24
It is safer to live near a nuclear power plant than to ride a plane, says an expert. Do we have a Not In M... Dec 11
- ▶ Mandatory mediation over noise - neighbourly relations are still key 16:23
How Singapore intends to settle noise disputes more effectively. Synopsis: Every month, The Straits TI... Nov 27
- ▶ Tan See Leng: How tough talks resulted in job seeker support 30:54
The SkillsFuture JobSeeker Support aims to help the job-searching tide over financially, while between job... Oct 14